Excerpt: . . . NOTES. Note 1, page 16. There are many writers and newspapers who have expressed the highest credit to The Hague Tribunal, to the Czar of Russia and to the Diplomats of the United States, who have done already for the establishment of that Tribunal in favor of the general peace of nations, just as if the whole matter were already settled. Such is the expression of the New York Times, December 27, 1902: While to the Czar of Russia must be given the credit of having proposed The Hague Tribunal, it owes its growth in influence chiefly to the United States. American diplomats have seized every opportunity since its organization in 1900 to make it a real force in international relations. In reality, however, The Hague Tribunal has no power at all to give out any judgment between nations nor to enforce it against their own consent, nor have the American diplomats made it a real force in international relations. Any arbitration between nations that can ever be made by that Tribunal is entirely left to the consent of the parties concerned, and only in such cases of very little value, for which no nation finds any necessity to expose to danger its Army and Navy. No arbitration was made for the last African war, nor any judgment has been given out by that Tribunal to the Russian Army to stop the fierce bloodshed in Manchuria, nor any effort is being made to settle...
