BISHOP. iliNGAGED in superintending the publication of my deceased friends Poetical Works, I conceive that the interest excited by the writings, will be extended to the author; and that the world will desire some information concerning the person, whose very productions prove him to have been distinguished by uncommon mental endowments. The trite observation, that the lives of literary men are deficient in incidents to gratify curiosity, could never be more justly applied, than on the present occasion. Nothing to attract the attention, or to amuse the imagination, can be expected in the memoirs of a writer, who published no work of importance; took no active part in public concerns; S was engaged in no controversy, nor involved in any personal dispute; whose days were rendered remarkable by no signal instance of either good or bad fortune; and whose whole life was passed in...
